Academic Standards in Arizona

ARIZONA STATE LIBRARY
ARCHIVES & PUBLIC RECORDS

Purpose and Introduction

MAY 24 2000

The purpose of this brief report is to present a balanced look at current issues surrounding the education reform known as "academic standards." Prepared by the Morrison Institute for Public Policy at the request of Greater Phoenix Leadership, the information contained in this report is intended for a business audience. It does not advocate any particular stance or make policy recommendations, but rather presents a platform from which the business community might choose a position. The report is organized around four areas of interest: (1) the national context for academic standards, (2) facts regarding Arizona's standards, (3) the pros and cons of academic standards, and (4) specific issues and positions in the national business community related to academic standards.

The National Move Toward Academic Standards

The 1983 report "A Nation at Risk," sparked an intense round of educational debate when it publicized the dismal performance of U.S. high school students compared to students in other industrialized countries. While many reform efforts were spawned from this debate, most federal efforts in the last five years have focused on establishing high academic standards for all American K-12 students.

Initial attempts to create national standards proved disappointing, quickly dissolving into political and ethical battles over content and balance. Nevertheless, in the early 1990s reformers pushed through two important pieces of federal legislation: "Goals 2000: Educate America Act," and "Improving America's Schools Act." These laws offered funding to states and school districts for the purpose of enacting strong academic standards and reforms that help students become more competitive academically. Also in the early 1990s, Arizona began developing public policies regarding academic standards through the Arizona Essential Skills standards and the Arizona Student Achievement Program. While Arizona's current standards are substantially different, they have drawn on some of the Essential Skills.

At present, nearly all states and the District of Columbia have developed academic standards in at least one "core" subject area (commonly considered to be math, science, language arts, history and geography). Most states, including Arizona, are testing or beginning to test against their standards as a requirement for graduation. But a closer look reveals that the various states' standards are not equally robust or demanding. A recent evaluation of state standards by the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation (a national educational reform research organization) concluded that many standards documents contain too much vague language to materially affect educational practices, curriculum, or student achievement. Arizona's
