

AIR POLLUTION HUMAN HEALTH IMPACTS

EYES

Because there is a high flow of blood in the eyes, they are especially sensitive to small pollution particles like those found in PM_{2.5}. Conditions such as dry eye syndrome, retinopathy, glaucoma, and cataracts have been connected to high air pollution exposure.

BRAIN

Air pollution exposure has been linked to a variety of neurological and cognitive impacts, including memory impairment, learning disabilities, anxiety, depression, schizophrenia, ADHD, and neurological conditions including dementia, Alzheimer's disease, Parkinson's disease, and stroke. Studies have even linked poorer air pollution decreases to lowered dementia risk.

LUNGS

A slew of respiratory impacts are attributed to dirty air, from respiratory inflammation to asthma development to chronic loss of pulmonary function. Because most air pollutants are breathed in, the respiratory system is often the place where air pollution-related disease is most readily observed.

HEART

Cardiovascular disease and death are closely linked to air pollution, with outcomes of heart disease, heart failure, cardiac arrest, and arrhythmias. Some studies have even shown a stronger correlation between cardiovascular damage and death after air pollution exposure than observed with respiratory diseases.

STOMACH

Studies have demonstrated a link between poor air quality and gastrointestinal diseases, including inflammatory bowel disease (IBD), irritable bowel syndrome (IBS), and appendicitis, as the inhalation of air pollution is associated with changes to the gut microbiota. Long-term exposure to high concentrations of NO₂ and PM has been linked to the early onset of Crohn's Disease.

LIVER

Animal studies find that long-term exposure to ambient air pollution is associated with metabolic-associated fatty liver disease, a disease that affects a quarter of the global population. The disease can progress to liver cancer and liver-related death.

BONES

A 2020 study found that ambient air pollution exposure is linked to lower bone mass. Other studies have found that air pollution may act as a risk factor for osteoporosis and be linked to higher rates of hospitalization for bone fractures, though research is limited.

REPRODUCTION

Though the mechanisms behind it are not yet understood, exposure to higher levels of air pollution has been associated with lower levels of fertility and more difficulty in conceiving, including in those undergoing in vitro fertilization, as well as in a variety of sperm quality parameters. Further research is needed to investigate how exactly air pollution acts on the reproductive system.
