

Students' perceptions about evaluation and assessment in higher education: a review<sup>1</sup>

Katrien Struyven*, Filip Dochy and Steven Janssens

University of Leuven (KULeuven), Belgium

In educational contexts, understanding the student's learning must take account of the student's construction of reality. Reality as experienced by the student has an important additional value. This assumption also applies to a student's perception of evaluation and assessment. Students' study behaviour is not only determined by the examination or assessment modes that are used. Students' perceptions about evaluation methods also play a significant role. This review aims to examine evaluation and assessment from the student's point of view. Research findings reveal that students' perceptions about assessment significantly influence their approaches to learning and studying. Conversely, students' approaches to study influence the ways in which they perceive evaluation and assessment. Findings suggest that students hold strong views about different assessment and evaluation formats. In this respect students favour multiple-choice format exams to essay type questions. However, when compared with more innovative assessment methods, students call the 'fairness' of these well-known evaluation modes into question.

Purpose of this review

This review was prompted by Entwistle's (1991) finding that the student's perception of the learning environment determines how s/he learns and not necessarily the educational context in itself. Reality as experienced by the often forgotten student, is an intervening variable, which cannot be neglected if full understanding of student learning is the purpose of our educational research and practices. However, student learning is related to evaluation practices. This provides the rationale for the primary focus of the present inquiry into student's perceptions about evaluation practices and assessment methods in our current learning environments. This paper aims, therefore, to present a comprehensive review of students' perceptions about assessment, which will make a significant contribution to our current understanding in the field.
