

PROGRESSIVE BURNING PAIN SYNDROME NEUROPATHOLOGY

James H. Peckham, Jr., M.D., Ph.D., Department of Neurology, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan

Abstract: Burning pain syndrome is a chronic, progressive, and debilitating condition characterized by a burning pain that is often described as a "hot coal" or "burning" sensation. The pain is typically worse at night and is often associated with allodynia and hyperalgesia. The pathophysiology of burning pain syndrome is not fully understood, but it is thought to involve a combination of peripheral and central nervous system changes. This review discusses the current understanding of the neurobiology of burning pain syndrome, including the role of peripheral nerve injury, central sensitization, and the involvement of the trigeminal ganglion and spinal cord. The review also discusses the clinical features of burning pain syndrome and the current treatment options.
