Editorial on the Research Topic

Regulation of pollen tube growth, volume II

The pollen tube is an extension produced by the pollen grain when conditions are favorable; thus, the pollen tube is important in seed plant reproduction because it transports male gametes. However, it is also an excellent system for studying various plant cell processes that are common to sink organs or tissues (Kroeger and Geitmann, 2012). The pollen tube has been used to study a variety of processes, including vesicular transport, cytoskeletal organization, cell wall deposition, ion gradients, intracellular signaling. Since the pollen tube grows by contacting and signaling to pistil cells, it is also a model for studying cell-cell communication (Brer and Redinger, 2021). Moreover, the pollen tube is involved in self-incompatibility (SI) processes that regulate reproduction and thus promote hybridization and genetic variability (Mandrone et al., 2019). SI is regulated by several factors, and in some cases, such as citrus, it is an important tool for producing seedless mandarins (Gentile et al., 2012). Pollen tube and pollen can also be targets of environmental stresses (Ledesma and Sugiyama, 2019), which can impair plant reproductive success, resulting in lower productivity of agronomically important plants and increasing allergenicity (pollinosis) (Arrossio et al., 2019; Singh and Mathur, 2021).

New information about the pollen tube is being published on a regular basis allowing us to better understand how the pollen tube promotes plant reproduction; the data also provides insight into how plant cells can change shape in response to specific external signals; and the data help us select plant genotypes that are more resistant to environmental stresses (Liu et al., 2006). For these reasons, we have agreed to serve as guest editors for this Research Topic on pollen tube growth regulation, which is a continuation of a previous one and covers a wide range of subjects.

A frequently asked question is whether the pollen tube nucleus is necessary for pollen tube growth. Motomura et al. used nucleated cells to show that the pollen tube can grow in the absence of its nucleus. This raises several concerns about the presence of persistent transcripts and thus the relative stability of previously produced mRNAs. Furthermore, this article emphasizes the independence of the pollen tube from the vegetative nucleus, at least with respect to growth.
