

Breast Cancer Risk Assessment and Management of the High-Risk Patient

Victoria L. Green, MD, JD, MBA^{a,b,c,*}

KEYWORDS

- High-risk breast disease • Breast cancer • Breast cancer risk assessment
- Risk assessment models • Genetic testing • Breastfeeding
- Risk reduction strategies • Pharmacologic prevention

KEY POINTS

- Identifying women at the highest risk of disease can facilitate provision of targeted prevention strategies and direct individualized clinical management to those likely to benefit most.
- Through a framework of shared decision-making, health providers can assist women in balancing their personal values, goals, and objectives through information gathering and generation of a breast cancer risk profile. This information aids providers and patients in articulating and implementing evidence-based risk reduction strategies, including enhanced screening, lifestyle interventions, genetic evaluation with cascade testing of family members, use of preventive medication, and risk-reducing surgery.
- Models are designed to either estimate a women's risk of developing breast cancer or an estimation of the likelihood of harboring a heritable genetic mutation such as the BRCA gene. However, although there is convincing evidence that available models can predict the number of cases of breast cancer expected to develop in a population, the tools perform modestly in discriminating between individual women who will or will not develop breast cancer over time.
- Known or likely pathogenic gene mutations conferring high risk for breast cancer include BRCA1/2, P53, PTEN, PALB2, and CDH1 among others. Markedly increased risk is also noted with ATM, BARD 1, BRIP1, CHEK2, and others. Moderate penetrance genes have been elucidated; however, management recommendations require further data analysis.
- Clinical decisions regarding preventive therapies involve more considerations than medical evidence alone because of concerns of cost, reproductive and hormonal considerations, quality of life issues, baseline comorbidities and medication contraindications, and toxicity profiles.
