

us, our duty would be to let stand the "temperament," but to discard the "temperaments" as they have been handed down to us—to carefully avoid confusing diathesis with temperament and to beware of basing any distinctions on mere accidental features—such as, perhaps, degree of pigmentation may prove to be. Finally, to make use of "race" if possible, fully recognizing the while that this is but the crutch we look forward to throwing away in the future of a more definite biology.

With regard to diathesis, we tread surer ground, and, to quote the author, "We can study the result of causes in detail and with much precision," and "we can express our knowledge in clear terms." . . . "It is in this direction that the work of the future will be done," thinks Mr. Hutchinson. No doubt, more immediately; this accomplished, we shall hope for the further step in the direction of temperament.

We have not thought fit to apologise for the introduction into a Journal of Mental Science of the above considerations; lest, however, any should be inclined to question the propriety of this, we would, in defence, only point to the definition of temperament here accepted, viz., "a fundamental mode of vital activity." That the activity of our nervous system, as a whole, is here included, none can doubt; can anyone doubt that, included equally, is the working of certain more highly differentiated parts of this system?

H. S.

Science du Cœur Humain ou la Psychologie des Passions d'après les Œuvres de Molière. Par Dr. PROSPER DESPINE. Paris: F. Savy. 1884.

The idea of a psychological study of a great writer is, as far as we know, novel, and is certainly not without scientific interest. In the book before us Dr. Despine has carefully gone through the works of Molière with the view of bringing out what he calls the Philosophy of the Passions contained in his dramatic works. Of the two forms of mental science—that which concerns itself with the intellect and that which treats more specially of those instinctive manifestations which are found in the history of human sentiment or passion—there are plausible reasons for maintaining, as Dr. Despine does, that the second is not the less impor-
