Building the New Courthouse, 1872-1873

ROBERT MOULTON GAYRE

When the citizens of Marion County contemplated the long-deferred edifice which they could start building their new Courthouse, they had first to dispose of the old Courthouse which occupied the site desired for the new building. The same building had once been the County office and had not only housed the County officers but had also served the community as an assembly place for public meetings. Among the most important of these was the old Courthouse which had served as the site for the Constitutional Convention in 1857. In the new critical citizens were aware of the decrepit condition of the building and how inadequate it was to meet the growing needs of the community. The fact that it was a public building was a source of concern and it was realized that it housed documents of inestimable value to the community. A contemporary account mentioned that "a brick vault was built in the County Clerk's room, for the better preservation of the public records. But it was very doubtful whether the vault is fireproof, and if the building were to burn, and an actual trial demonstrate that it is not fire proof, the loss thus sustained would be irreparable."¹

The old Courthouse had been built during the years of 1812 and 1814 by James W. Montgomery.² The County officers had no plan for the cost of the building and the contractors were bonded for one thousand dollars. The County Court was so greatly restricted that an important part of the money was raised by public subscription. A. W. Ferguson, one of the contractors, was authorized to seek contributions and was instructed by the County Court as to methods of issuing receipts and handling the funds. Upon his resignation as collector, C. N. Terry was appointed to take over the task. Apparently the money was sometimes more readily subscribed than paid, for in May 1813 the record says, "This day the court ordered that all money due the County on Court house subscriptions, if not paid by the 20th day of June A. D. 1813, that suit shall be instituted against subscriber."³ One of the interesting contributions was made by the Oregon Institute (Willamette University) through its agent, William H. Willson, in form of four lots, the proceeds from their sale to be applied on the building.⁴

Rather amazing from the point of view of a later day was an order adopted the same day the lots were accepted, which provided that a prize of thirty dollars should be offered for a "plan or draft" of the new building and twenty dollars offered for the one that "shall be adjudged next in priority to the one accepted." Architect fees were certainly to be no burden to the new building project! The plan submitted by A. W. Ferguson, one of the builders, won the first prize.

In this important meeting of the County Court the Commissioners "proceeded to locate and establish the particular spot on which the Court House for
