Diffusion-Weighted MR Imaging (DW-MRI) and Diffusion-Weighted MR Spectroscopy (DW-MRS) Maryam Afzali, Lars Mueller, André Döring, Clemence Ligneul, Chloe Najac, Itamar Ronen, 2024-06-26 Magnetic Resonance Imaging MRI is a unique technique that provides tissue specific contrast non invasively However even at ultra high field resolution remains on the millimeter scale far above cellular microstructure Taking the fact that diffusion of nuclear spins in magnetic field gradients results in a characteristic signal loss MRI can be sensitized to water diffusion DW MRI to recover microstructural information indirectly Diffusion Weighted MR Spectroscopy DW MRS goes one step further by not measuring the diffusion of tissue water but of cell type specific metabolites Given that both techniques can provide complementary information DW MRI on water diffusion with high spatial resolution but without cellular specificity and DW MRS on cell type specific metabolite diffusion but with a limited spatial resolution single volume and at a lower signal to noise ratio SNR To meet the needs of sophisticated tissue and cell modeling strategies to derive quantitative microstructural measures both techniques have to be sensitized to specific length scales and structural features

This can only be achieved by constant development in sequence design diffusion encoding tissue modeling data processing and technical equipment This research topic aims to attract contributions from all these fields targeting DW MRI and DW MRS improvement to accomplish two fundamental goals 1 providing unique intra voxel distributions of a set of diffusion parameters instead of an averaged value allowing the identification of multiple compartments and tissue microstructure 2 enabling higher accuracy and precision in derived quantitative values Acquisitional computational and pulse design technological breakthroughs have positioned DW MRI and DW MRS as powerful emerging modalities for studying biological media from muscle to the central nervous system exhibiting extraordinary sensitivity and specificity in differentiating normal from pathologic cell level processes and microstructural alterations We welcome studies and manuscripts covering all aspects of DW MRI DW MRS tissue cell modeling study protocol design or technical innovation from theoretical studies focusing on the mathematical and physiological background of tissue microstructural modeling to technical developments to phantom studies to novel acquisition and sampling strategies to improved diffusion encoding techniques to clinical studies We are encouraging the submission of the following types of manuscripts original research and brief research reports methods protocols and study protocols review and mini review perspective hypothesis and theory technology and code clinical trial case report classification and data report Topics for submitted papers can be in one of the following general categories Development of processing methods instrumentation or experimental design of DW MRI and DW MRS Introduction of new theoretical or simulation models to DW MRI or DW MRS In vivo human and animal in vitro in silico phantom and ex vivo studies are welcome Mobile Wireless Communications Mischa Schwartz,2005 Publisher Description
