

Administrative Reform

Administrative reform is essentially related to the idea of 'change' in administration which is brought about through deliberate efforts. The nature of administrative reform is to be clarified first. Secondly, reform efforts have to be related to the surrounding conditions that generate or suppress demands for reform. Thirdly, reform strategies differ from situation to situation and aim at solving different kinds of administrative problems. The different types of reforms have therefore to be identified, and the reform process needs to be explained. Fourthly, implementation poses problems perhaps more serious than recommendation. The issues involved in the implementation of reform proposals deserve careful consideration.

Meaning of Reform

Administration being constantly involved in practical action situations cannot afford to remain static. It has necessarily to change for the sake of sheer survival. Four principal goals of reorganisation identified by Mosher are : changing policy and programmes, improving administrative effectiveness, solving personnel problems, and countering pressures and threats from outside organisation. Of these,
