

Research for social workers: An introduction to methods (4th ed.)

Margaret Alston and Wendy Bowles, 2018
Allen & Unwin, Crows Nest, Australia
ISBN 978-1-76029-744-2, pp. 522, paperback, NZD56.99

Social workers must understand their responsibility for research and publications (ANZASW, 2013; SWRB 2016), develop “research-mindedness” (Flynn & McDermott, 2016), including being ongoing critical consumers of research evidence that can be incorporated into everyday practice (Gray, Plath, & Webb, 2009), and increasingly, become social work research practitioners (Beddoe, Yates, Fouche, & Harrington, 2010). As a social work educator who works alongside students to understand the value of research evidence in decision-making, I found this text helpful and highly recommend it as a resource for students and graduates. This fourth edition provides an accessible guide for beginning researchers to some key research philosophies, perspectives, strategies, designs and methods. Choosing a research topic, developing answerable questions, selecting appropriate methodology and methods, analysing findings, documenting and disseminating the research are all discussed with embedded social work research examples. Chapters conclude with further reading lists, discussion questions and exercises to aid understanding. The well-referenced text is divided into five parts (beginning social work research; research methods for social work; evaluation; statistical analysis; bringing it all together) with a number of chapters within each part. Chapters can be utilised as stand-alone or together as a congruent whole consideration of research for social workers. The text sits alongside many familiar social science research methodology texts and provides excellent connections for the reader to the field of social work research.

Part one introduces social work research. In chapter one the priorities in the research process of social work values, human rights and social justice within political, social, and economic contexts, with a focus on action and change are all identified. While the cultural context of research is briefly explored later in the chapter, greater prominence for the place of indigenous research could be made. The chapter explores quantitative and qualitative methodological strategies as well as emancipatory, feminist and postmodern influences on research methods. While outlining different forms of research and the power of underlying beliefs separately for clarity, the explanation of how mixed methods, combining aspects of these strategies and methodologies, can enhance the validity of the research findings is useful. The authors argue that inductive and deductive thinking can be seen as different phases of a cyclical process of developing knowledge, theory building and theory testing. A discussion around the politics and ethics of research concludes this chapter. The questions and exercises provide a useful guide for the critical analysis of research publications as well as consideration of the many dimensions of developing a research project.

Chapter two explores choosing a research topic and the importance of identifying the underlying conceptual framework in defining the criteria and purpose of the research. The value of an advisory group made up of the project’s key players is also outlined. Chapter three focuses on developing the research questions utilising either a quantitative or qualitative
