Human Longevity David W. E. Smith,1993 This absorbing balanced account of human longevity draws together information from the fields of medicine biology demography epidemiology gerontology and sociology It describes the history and present status of human longevity and deals in logical sequence with the questions this subject raises The book illustrates how life expectancy has increased in most countries due in part to changing causes of death It examines the biological determinants of longevity and analyzes social and behavioral factors that may reduce longevity The book covers the reasons why women live longer than men It asks why the maximum human life span is nearly twice that of any other warm blooded animal and much longer than required for reproductive success and it discusses factors that were involved in the evolution of longevity It presents predictable increases in human life expectancy and explores the possibility that the maximum human life expectancy may become even longer Accessible comprehensive and original this book provides a multidisciplinary synthesis of ideas and conclusions about human longevity It will have wide appeal to professionals in the many areas concerned with longevity as well as lay readers
