Richard Gordon Fletcher's story from the British comedy series, written by Dick Clement and Ian La Frenais, is the basis for this feature film. The series has had a reputation as being the funniest film series of the 1970s. A Wilson Production for Black Star Film.

Ronnie Barker's last filmed performance before his death in 1971 was his role as Governor of the prison in the film 'Porridge'. It was the last film appearance by Richard Burt, who died shortly after the film's release.

During the course of the story, Fletcher and Godfather find themselves unexpectedly 'free' and this provides the laughing matter.

A film adaptation of the series was made in 1975.

Producers McKenzie and La Frenais were commissioned to shoot the film on location at Mill Hill, a residential development, but at all times a top priority was to get the film made on time. The project was not just a comedy but a comedy with a political background and the film's message could be played, but the producers themselves had their officers when the project, in the hospital block.
