

square. The hardness of the crystal is equal to that of corundum (9 on Mohs' scale), so that specimens are not easily scratched or deformed. The theoretical maximum wave-length of X-rays with which the crystal can be used is $2d$, or about 22.5 \AA , corresponding to an angle of reflection of 90° ; the wave-length corresponding to an angle of reflection of 60° is about 19.5 \AA .

Previous attempts to find crystals with large grating-constants have been restricted to substances with complicated chemical formulas; such a procedure appears unnecessary in light of the surprising discovery of the unusually large constant possessed by crystals of the simple inorganic substance β -alumina.

ON QUASI-ANALYTIC FUNCTIONS

BY J. HADAMARD

COLLEGE DE FRANCE, PARIS

Communicated May 12, 1925

A recent note of G. Julia in the Comptes Rendes de l'Academie des Sciences in Paris (180, p. 720, March, 1925) may have most remarkable consequences in the coming years, as appears if we pay attention to the general properties of quasi-analytic functions and their mutual relations.

As yet, calculations and special studies in Calculus have, above all, concerned analytic functions. Where does this quite special importance come from? It is clear that it is due to two main circumstances, which are:

(1) That the simplest known functions—beginning with $y=f(x)=x$ itself—those which we want it the most elementary and usual calculations, are analytic:

(2) That they generate each other by the main operations of Calculus: algebraic operation, substitution of functions in functions, differentiation, integration, and so on—i.e., carrying out such operations on analytic functions always leads to functions which are again analytic.

Quasi-analytic functions, or, more exactly, definite classes of quasi-analytic functions, also admit of the latter property. Therefore, if amongst
