

application. At this time H. E. D. Scovil was very interested in the technical possibilities of reversed domains and brought these problems to the attention of Shockley, who consulted at Bell Laboratories a few days each month. It was realized that a material with properties different from permalloy was needed; in fact, the hypothetical properties that were needed were quite well understood, and a conference to assess the possibilities was called by Shockley for March 22, 1966. A possible material under discussion was a film of manganese bismuth, MnBi. H. J. Williams and R. C. Sherwood of the Bell Laboratories research area were expert on this material and were asked to join the conference.

3.8.2 The Scientific Background

When they think about magnetism, many people recall that a magnet will pick up objects made of iron or steel but has no effect on other metals such as copper, aluminum, or brass. Indeed iron, and its neighbors in the periodic table—cobalt and nickel—are the principal magnetic metals. Oxides of these metals, however, are also often magnetic, and a favorite example is magnetite, or lodestone, which is one of the oxides of iron, Fe_3O_4 , and was well known in ancient times. Magnetic oxides, in contrast to the metals, are often excellent insulators and in thin sections can be quite transparent to light. Modern research on ferromagnetic insulators begins with the work of J. Snoek in the Netherlands in the early 1930's. After working in secret during the years of German occupation, Snoek announced in 1947³⁵ that he could make a ferrite ferromagnet with high resistivity. Ferrites are oxides involving two metals such as iron and nickel; they are analogous to Fe_3O_4 and have the type formula NiFe_2O_4 . Because of their high resistivity, ferrites can be used to make transformers that operate at frequencies up to 10^8 Hz. Such transformers are now vitally important in electronic circuits used for communications and television.

The ferrites accordingly were studied intensively after the war in many laboratories in the United States. At Bell Laboratories a long series of experiments was carried out to increase understanding of magnetic properties in terms of the domain picture. Williams took up work on this topic at the suggestion of Shockley shortly after World War II. Working with Shockley,³⁶ he performed the classic experiment demonstrating that the domain theory gave a quantitatively accurate description of the magnetization process. Williams perfected many of the techniques used in domain observation and over the years applied them to hundreds of magnetic samples. With co-workers he studied the motion of domain walls in single crystals of silicon iron.³⁷ Domain wall motion experiments in single crystals of nickel ferrite were performed by Galt beginning in 1952³⁸ and in manganese ferrite by Dillon in 1956.³⁹
