ABSTRACT

From 1925 through 1930, the Logan Museum of Anthropology conducted extensive archaeological work in North Africa, principally Algeria. The museum houses nearly 120,000 specimens from 200 site locations. However, with a few notable exceptions, scholars have made little use of this material. Here, we summarize the collections and highlight two of the many research topics they can address. First, techno-typological review of Iberomaurusian assemblages from the case of Adil Bacha, near Bejaia (Bougie) on the Mediterranean coast of Algeria, will constitute an important regional contribution in light of new research at other North African sites. Second, site distribution analysis via GIS of numerous Capsian escarpments, surveyed and excavated by the Logan Museum team, can provide insight on Capsian settlement patterns in northeastern Algeria. In view of the growing interest in studying extant collections, scholars should consider employing Logan Museum collections as resources for Maghreb-region Paleolithic and Epipaleolithic research.

1. Introduction

The Logan Museum of Anthropology, founded in 1893, is a teaching museum of Beloit College, an undergraduate liberal-arts institution with about 1300 students in the state of Wisconsin, USA. In support of the college's mission of engaging and empowering students through the liberal arts and sciences, the museum promotes hands-on, interdisciplinary, and international approaches to learning. Large collections from around the world and a focus on student involvement in collection management, research, and interpretation make the Logan Museum a unique campus and community learning center. The museum's collections also attract visiting scholars who interact with students and generate new knowledge and material for exhibitions, educational programs, and publications. To foster effective use of collections, the museum has placed high priority on improving preservation of and access to its archaeological and ethnographic material (see e.g., Beloit College, 1995; Green and Meixner, 2009; Whiteford, 1996).

In this article we present overviews of the Logan Museum's North African archaeological collections and of two ongoing research projects that are using these collections to address particular problems in Maghreb prehistory. We hope this information will encourage other scholars to consider the applicability of Logan Museum resources to their research.

2. Background

Logan Museum staff and associated faculty members have conducted fieldwork throughout the museum's history. The 1920s and 1930s were particularly active times, when the museum's founding patron, Frank Logan, supported archaeological work in Africa, Asia, Europe, and North America. From 1925 through 1930, Museum staff and students conducted surveys and excavations in North Africa, primarily in Algeria. The museum's curator, George L. Collie, provided overall direction and some field supervision, while assistant curator Alfonso Pond directed most of the fieldwork and analyzed and reported the results (Pond, 1928a; Pond et al., 1938). Pond was in Africa every year from 1925 through 1930, except for 1928 when he worked in Inner Mongolia with Roy Chapman Andrews of the American Museum of Natural History (see Breiborade, 1992 for a collection of articles on Pond's work and its significance).

Museum personnel were drawn to Algeria because of an interest in the origins of modern humans in Europe (Pond, 1928a; New York Times, 1928a, 1928b). The principal research question related to the
