W. J. WILSON and
D. J. WILSON

Technical services workstations are a critical component of the information systems infrastructure of many organizations. They provide a platform for the development, testing, and deployment of new applications and services. The planning and implementation of these workstations is a complex task that requires careful consideration of a wide range of factors, including hardware, software, network, and security. This paper discusses the key considerations for planning and implementing technical services workstations, and provides a framework for organizations to use in their own planning efforts.

The first step in planning a technical services workstation is to define the requirements for the workstation. This includes identifying the specific tasks that the workstation will be used for, the number of users who will be using the workstation, and the level of performance that is required. Once the requirements are defined, the next step is to select the hardware and software that will be used to build the workstation. This selection process should take into account the requirements, the budget, and the availability of resources. Once the hardware and software have been selected, the next step is to design the workstation architecture. This involves determining the network configuration, the security requirements, and the backup and recovery procedures. Finally, the workstation is implemented and tested to ensure that it meets the requirements and is ready for use.
