

are faced with the prospect of no waste disposal facilities, of necessity will be forced to discontinue manufacture of radionuclides. Either of these events would make beneficial diagnostic and therapeutic procedures unavailable to millions of people who need such care, and also could create a health problem comparable to or worse than the potential safety and health hazards of low-level radioactive waste disposal.

What are some of the alternate solutions to this great threat to the practice of nuclear medicine and jeopardy to the future of biomedical research? It is abundantly clear that the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission first must differentiate the low level radioactive wastes of medical and biomedical research uses from higher level radioactive waste materials from industry or energy producing sources. Burial of these low-level radioactive wastes then should be encouraged.

The Washington and Nevada dump sites have since been opened. Each area has stiffened its waste packaging, labelling, and transportation regulations and has threatened not to accept out-of-state shipments or shipments rejected from another site. This then suggests that federal and/or regional disposal sites for medical low-level radionuclide wastes must be identified and opened with strict regulatory control and sound technological principles. Sites in each state for that particular state also could be developed.

A novel proposal to solve the nuclear waste problem is the use of thousands of square kilometers of impermeable undersea caverns. Scientists at Columbia University's Lamont-Doherty Geological Observatory feel that these vast chambers could seal radioactive wastes and toxic chemicals forever.<sup>3</sup> The above corrective measures could prevent a moratorium on biomedical nuclear research and would help bridge the gap between government regulatory agencies and the medical research community.

THE MYTH OF THE "SENILITY MYTH"

Terry L. Brink, PhD
San Carlos, California

In the past decade, tabloids in stands by grocery checkouts and more moderate family and news magazines have used large type and dramatized vignettes to convey the message: There is no such thing as senility. If old people act that way, it is only because of compulsory retirement, age stereotypes, discrimination, and inactivity. The American public now believes that senile dementia is nothing more than a wastebasket term employed by physicians and psychologists who are callous and incapable of treating what really ails the aging patient.

An article appeared last fall in a Sunday supplement to numerous metropolitan newspapers which quoted me as saying that sometimes a serious depression can be misdiagnosed as senile dementia. Later in the same week, I received several telephone calls from persons who suspected that their parents had been misdiagnosed. I took, among others of these cases, that of Mr. Q., age 70, currently in a long-term care facility with a diagnosis of chronic brain syndrome, Alzheimer's type. From his son's report of the family history, I
