

... a cozy little barn

A week seldom passed that someone didn't come hoping Jessie would have an apartment for rent. She'd proudly tell them no, that all her apartments were occupied, then sadly watch them leave, wishing she did have another to rent.

The only unoccupied structure remaining from Jessie's dairy was the small unpainted barn. It sat on the opposite side of the dairy house from the big house, located barely on Padgett property.

"Move into the barn! No, mother, you can't mean it!" Eleanor cried when Jessie finally made her decision. "What will my friends at school think?"

"I can't help what they think, child. It's the only way I've got to make a living for you children."

Converting the barn into a suitable dwelling was Jessie's greatest challenge. She won Bobby and his friends foraging behind Black Mountain mines for wooden crates and cardboard boxes. She and Charley nailed strips from crates to cover large cracks in the outside walls, then lined the inside walls with cardboard from the boxes. By the time the first icy winds howled down from Craggy and its great rim of mountains, the little barn-house was ready for them.

Bobby proudly admired her handwork. "I know it isn't a mansion," she told her two children. "It's only a barn, and its walls are mostly paper."
"Thoughtful dreams flash through her mind—of the great castle sitting grandly atop Brasenator Mountain and of Scoutor Vencor's rambling mansion, Goodhouse, that once sat high on the slopes under Craggy. With a toss of her head she shook such unfulfilled dreams from her thoughts.

"Even if it is just a barn, children, don't you think it's a cozy little place?"
