KNOWLEDGE MANAGEMENT: CONCEPTS AND CONTROVERSIES

JACKY SWAN

HARRY SCARBROUGH

University of Leicester

The papers in this special issue are derived from the conference on 'Knowledge Management: Concepts and Controversies', hosted by the Economic and Social Research Council's Business Process Resource Centre at Warwick University in February 2000. This event was one of the first avowedly academic conferences on the topic. That it attracted researchers from a wide range of disciplines and countries and around 120 submissions and 200 participants (when expected 80) attested to a growing disquiet with the faddish nature of what had been claimed to that point in the name of 'knowledge management'. Of those submissions, the papers presented here were selected primarily on the basis of their particular merits as determined by peer review. However, taken together they also provide a summary of some of the critical controversies in the knowledge management 'field'. In their different ways, these papers help us to contextualize knowledge management and expose some of the assumptions that govern this particular form of discourse. By standing outside, and critiquing, the knowledge management mainstream they can help us to evaluate the grandiose claims which have been made for knowledge management to date.

Before we address the papers themselves, however, it is important to place this special issue itself in context. Our primary reference-point here is the special issue of the Journal of Management Studies from November 1993 (30:6) on 'Knowledge Workers and Contemporary Organizations'. That issue not only provided an excellent summary of existing studies of knowledge and knowledge workers in contemporary organizations and management – fertile subsoil for later growth – but also came just a year or two before the explosive expansion of the knowledge management literature (Scarborough and Swan, 2001). Thus, in the 1993 issue we can see some of the elements which coalesced in the rise of knowledge management, discrete and untouched by the new wave to come.

Significantly, a major theme in that earlier special issue was the sceptical and questioning approach which it adopted towards notions of 'knowledge work' and the 'knowledge society'. The editorial in this issue rejected a broadly normative conception of the 'knowledge society' as merely reflecting the economic
