

The Tale of Two Managers: A Value-Based Saga

Narayan Krishna Prabhu, Sri Sathya Sai Central Trust (SSSCT), India

ABSTRACT

Human resource development managers are concerned about recruiting competent and value-based people in organizations. Values can be seen at the individual, organizational and corporate levels and also in a national context. Culture and society play an important part in shaping values and behavior. This paper relates the cases of two managers, born in different periods of time, having particular generational values, and consequently different dominant work values and personality traits. The interviews with stakeholders and other role holders also echo the same. Amongst a cross-section of employees, it is seen that some values are commonly found, whereas other values are unevenly distributed. Personality attributes, as propounded by organizational experts - like Type A personality traits, proactive personality constructs, core self-evaluation risk-taking and high-flyer dimensions - are seen in varying degrees in the employees. Again, there are issues like integrity, loyalty, and whistleblowing which are prevalent in a skewed manner. Organizational commitment is seen as responsible for bonding. Stories about the founder have kept the organizations surging forward. All these artifacts are seen suffused with values.

'Once you recognize the value of human life, you will be able to understand human values' (Baba, 2001, p.167).

INTRODUCTION

Human Resource Development & Values

Those were the days when we had virtuous employees, top management bestowed their unconditional affection on the employees, and all organizational aspects were inclusive. There are instances, even today, of such virtuousness; it could be culture – specific! As a management function, Human Resources Development (HRD) is not only concerned about the acquisition of knowledge, skills, and abilities which is mandated by all, but it is equally concerned about generating moral, ethical, social, humanistic and spiritual values in them. HRD is not merely a tool or instrument to produce only workforce for the organization, but also to fit them in a learned and knowledgeable society. Mere professional knowledge and expertise are not enough. HRD should be actually a mission, a movement, and much more than a mere profession or a vocation. HRD should aim in creating an integrated personality and aim at the simultaneous development of the physical, mental, aesthetic, affective, artistic and intellectual, innovative, imaginative, and intuitive faculties endowed to the human beings. HRD... should synergistically blossom and sublimates ... to discover the supreme reality and achieve self-actualization. HRD should aim at a higher objective of bringing about a new species of human beings with human values for their all-round development with commitment to themselves, society, their country, and the world at large. Intellectual growth must be combined with socialization. These call for self-discovery, self-confidence, self-estimate/evaluation, self-motivation, self-learning, and self-reliance (Rao, 2004).

Values: Concepts

Values are important to the study of human beings in an organization because they lay the foundation of understanding people's attitudes, behavior, and other's perceptions. Individuals enter an organization with preconceived notions of what "ought" and "ought not" to be (Robbins et al., 2009). According to the definition by
