

difficulty, only in manuscript, Mr. le Strange has achieved a task which must at the outset have appeared almost impossible; he has reconstructed for us the City of the Caliphs at its different periods, has traced its topography in detail, has located its palaces, its markets, its walls, its gardens, its shrines, and other places of interest, and has plotted it out, street by street and quarter by quarter, in a series of excellent maps by the help of which we shall now be able to follow the historian's narrative with an understanding and appreciation incomparably greater than heretofore.

In the best work of scholarship even there are degrees: the judicious collector of manuscripts supplies the raw materials; the cataloguer shows us where to lay our hands on the materials we need; the editor of unpublished texts casts them into shape, and supplies us, as it were, with the bricks for our building; the translator prepares them for the synthetic historian, who will finally produce therewith a harmonious and well-proportioned edifice for the pleasure and profit of those who little realize the long labours of the "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Only now and then is it given to one individual to carry the work through from the earliest to the latest stage, and to raise with the bricks which he himself has fashioned the edifice wherein all may delight, the monument which the scholar and the ordinary reader alike may recognize as marking a fresh conquest in the domains of science. Of these master-craftsmen Mr. le Strange is one, and as such it is fitting that we should offer him not only our congratulations, but our homage.
