

Identification

Identification of most birds becomes easier with experience: most of us can quickly identify a Robin or a House Sparrow. A familiar bird is like a familiar face in a crowd; an unfamiliar one is just as difficult as trying to find a person you have never seen before in a crowded street, based on a description in a book or from a small photograph. Identifying a bird is usually a process based on a range of information: the place, habitat, time of year, size and shape of the bird, colours, markings, the way it flies and moves, and its general behaviour.

Location

Similar species often live in different habitats, thus exploiting different feeding or nesting opportunities and avoiding competition with each other. Knowing this is helpful in identifying them. For example, Skybirds occur on open ground, rarely even close to a hedgerow, and may perch on a low fence but not on high wires. Woodlarks, by contrast, live along woodland edges and heaths, often close to bushy cover, and will perch high on a tree or wire.

Size

Judging size can be difficult but it is a useful clue to identification. If you see an unfamiliar bird, try to estimate its size against a more familiar one. Waders, for instance, range from tiny (Little Stint) or small (Dunlin) to middle-sized (Red-throat), large (Blue-tailed Godwit) or very large (Curlew). More subtly, warblers range from tiny (Goldcrest) to small (Garden Warbler) or, for a warbler, large (Great Reed Warbler).

Body Shape

Judge a bird's overall shape if you can. Is it long and thin, short and squat, tall or short? The bill and leg lengths affect your judgement but use familiar birds, such as the Blue Tit (stumpy), Blackbird (round but longer-tailed), or Swallow (long-bodied, long-tailed) for comparison. Remember that even small, slim birds can look round and stumpy in cold weather.

Bill Shape

Is the bill long or short, thick or thin, straight or curved? Is it pointed, stubby, hooked, narrow, or broad and flattened at the tip? Getting a good idea of its shape will help you to put the bird into a smaller group, narrowing down the possibilities. Bill shape is generally related to the bird's diet, as indicated here.

Tail Shape

The tail helps a bird steer and brake in flight, but may also be developed for display. Its shape and proportions are invaluable in pinning down a bird to a family group and can be noted down almost immediately. Look for obvious features, such as a deep notch or fork, long outer or central feathers, or a diamond shape. Be aware, though, that tail shape can change dramatically, for example, a straight, narrow tail can be spread like a fan as the bird soars or lands.
