

Is Hypocrisy Comedy or Tragedy?

Walter T. C. These hypocrites, east and west, find the mean out of their own eyes.—Lyle, 341-2—Beware of the horns of the Plutocrat which is Hypocrisy.

This is the age of sham, misrepresentation and fraud; to the right and to the left you see paint, powder, flax and show. The spectacular and the pretentious control in all things. The interloper is the most expert artisan, and the counterfeiter is almost beyond detection.

In matters of religion, supreme wisdom is needed to distinguish the false. The naked truth is unknown to many, and is unsearched by a larger number.

Hypocrisy is a religious drama. In some respects it assumes the form of a comedy; but, from the standpoint of influence over others, and of results to the actor, it is a serious tragedy. The hypocrite is the most influential pretender the world has ever seen. He plays a part for an effect; he pretends in order to accomplish his ends; he enacts his drama, hoping to deceive spectators, blind the public, and thereby gratify his insatiable, perjured soul; his every act and speech betrays his character and real nature; he talks like an angel, and acts like a devil; he theorizes like a philosopher, and practices like a fiend; his pretensions are loud and profane, his deeds are empty and villainous; his pretended knowledge of God is boundless; his possession of the truth is nil; he condemns adulterers and whores like every known law of truth; he professes honesty, and is the personification of perjury and deception; he denounces hypocrisy and is its concrete embodiment; he strains at gnats and swallows camels without hesitation or struggle.

The Up-to-Date Deacon.

Listen to him as he advocates a strict observance of the Sabbath, yet refuses to pay his honest debts. In a well known church, a certain Deacon grew so pious and scrupulous, regarding the question of church members, that he refused to pass the plate for the usual Sunday. Yet, after stating the reasons for his action to be that, he believed it a violation of the scriptural doctrine announced by Christ, when he denounced the money changers for turning His house into a place of merchandise, and for the conversion of His house. Yet, that deacon, repudiated his obligations, dressed his family in debt-burdened clothing, graduated his daughter in a costly outfit, and laughed at the merchant when he presented the bill. He was extremely pious in the church, but dishonest in the shop; he was pretentious and religious in form, but was meager and empty in practice.

Public Characters.

To the hypocrite private virtue is a rarity, honesty, virtue and truth, and their sublimity to the hypocrite unless he can parade them before the public for praise and applause. Secret righteousness is to him folly. For all his apparently righteous deeds he demands publicity; but, for his secret mercenary purposes, would he do as well, his religious, his popular favor, and would sacrifice his life for the public's gratitude. He feeds upon the compliments of men, and worships at the shrine of ecclesiastical honors. His law is the law of self-seeking, self-honoring and self-love. If vice is at a premium, he will be vicious; if it will bring him public position; if righteousness and truth are in the ascendant, he will be their greatest advocate and their strongest defender for the same purpose. He must have, at all hazards, and regardless of all consequences, the recognition of the public.

The Pharisee.

The Pharisee is never so happy as when he is called "Right." He feels really great when he is in the high seat of the synagogue; he loves show, position and authority. He is a zealot in an angel's garb; he is an executive in a devil's robes; he is incarnate corruption in the habiliments and beneath the crown of royalty; his righteousness consists entirely of the external forms and the ritualistic rites of religion; he does not seek to do an angel's work; he is a single outward means of grace, neglect a service of the church, nor violate the rules of the fast or feast day; yet in his shop, he shortens the yardstick, decreases the number of ounces to the pound, sands the sugar, chokes the poor, betrays the widow, robs the orphan, profanes the cradle and desecrates the grave. He is a saint during Lent, and a stoner incarnate for the remaining three hundred and twenty-five days of the year.

On Sunday, his robes are immaculate, his Bible in beneath his arm, his face represents the last fleeting hour of time, his expression of piety is appalling, his prayer is sincere, his hymn is spiritual, his pretended abstinence to the purpose is the riveted hypocrisy of a hypocrite. He is the acute business thief, the professional gambler, the adroit politician, the blasphemous official, the broad-brimmed libertine, the diamonded adulterer; yes, he is the devil himself.

Time and place have much to do with his religious life. He rises early, is religiously meditative for a few moments, and devoutly sanctimonious throughout the perfunctory family prayer service; then, printing the kiss of a Judas upon wife and children, hurries away to his business to assume the role of chicanery king and commercial trickster.

The Hypocrite Outside the Church.

The hypocrite outside the church is always a hypocrite in his condemnation of others, but is extremely lenient when discussing himself. He boasts that he is honest, and loudly proclaims his utter disgust for those in the church who are inconsistent with his teachings. He ostentatiously asserts that he is honest in his own life; he is making a strenuous effort toward a life of righteousness. Their paths may be strewn with failures and mistakes, but their faces are toward the New Jerusalem, and their efforts are in the line of truth.

When a hypocrite's confession of honesty is a verdict of guilt and condemnation. His very profession of sinfulness is the highest mark of hypocrisy. His boasted acknowledgment of sin is in itself a phase of the insidious drama, and it is an open admission of iniquity and crime. He says the words which should convict him as honest. He means that he is flagrantly impudent. The most commendable deed he can do is a nearer approach to honesty. It is a credit to the thief to rush into court and to the public prosecutor, "I am a thief, and my conscience is at ease in knowing that my confession convict him of crime and brand him as a criminal? When you condemn the back-door drunk, and boast that you are a front door drinker, are you not an impudent, confessed, perpetual drunkard? Does your confession of the crime lessen your credit? Does it guarantee the elimination of devicery, or refer you in the garments of righteousness?"

This hypocrite openly avows that if he were a member of the church, he would support it liberally, but as he is not, he spends his money for pleasure and the gratification of his unbridled passions. That is a confession that he is catering to the appetite of a degenerate and carnal public. If he thought for a moment that his magnificent gifts, now bestowed upon a Hellish and depraved world, would bring him unbounded honor if given to the church, he would lay upon its altar his uncounted millions.

The Hypocrite in the Church.

The hypocrite in the church always has three acts in his drama. The first is public prayer. He has secret prayer in mockery; he has never uttered one. Public prayer is but a showy appeal, or an ecclesiastical oration uttered to and for the public's ears. Communion with hypocrites is a mockery; prayer-conversation with the street corner crowd or synagogues-mothering, is his delight.

The second act is public fast, by which he demands the attention of every man, and seeks to impress the world with the seriousness of his holy and religious character.

The third act is public philanthropy. He pours his crimes upon the heavy drama of public applause, performs his deeds of charity upon the busy strings of time; for every wicked he speaks he gives three blasts of the trumpet. Secret philanthropy would be to him an act of dishonour; public philanthropy is to him secret virtue. If he occupies an exalted position in the church, he is happy, contented and amiable; if the congregation speak of him as pious and true, his praise is assured and his sleep is undisturbed; if the pastor and officers point to him as the most philanthropic of benefactors, his cup of joy is full and his crown is complete.

Be Not Deceived.

The ridiculousness of the whole situation lies in the fact that it is absolutely impossible to dramatize God, or to successfully fool the public all the time. He should understand the meaning of the words, "The end doeth itself, and is not caused by itself." He has failed to dramatize the real spirit of humanity. Therefore, it is a most ridiculous comedy; but, to himself, and to those whom he influences, it is a most disastrous tragedy. Men controlled by his designs will commit the most heinous crimes; his example will inevitably be damned; to himself the result will be the awful realization of having played a false part in life's great purpose. When, at last, he stands before his God stripped, his wall will be heard throughout the universe; his appeal will be heard wherever he has been; he sleeps to receive him and the moon-kins to cover him. His message to earth will be: "Friends and relatives, follow me not, I lived a treacherous, false, vicious, empty and truthless life; I presented truth as a drama, but I mean to show in truth, my life was a sham, but my life is a reality."

My friends, we are all more or less tinged with the pretensions and are influenced by human nature's love for Christianity.

Christianity is of the heart; it asks not for worldly, class, nor for the approval of men; it asks us to suffer in the dark, live in obscurity, and occupy an unmarked grave; it handles the pick and spade, shoulders the Cross and carries all burdens; it is light to midnight's darkness and food to poverty's intense suffering; it is sorrow's approved reward; it is life's eternal spring; it is death's conqueror, the grave's enemy, and the soul's perfect redemption. True, sincere religion is life's unchangeable character, and the heart's boundless affection. In the midst of adversity, hypocrisy is the greatest stench. In God's thought and man's heart, the stench of hypocrisy is the most precious jewel, the fairest flower and the nearest approach to divinity.
