Abstract Sexual racism is a specific form of racial prejudice enacted in the context of sex or romance. Online, people use sex and dating profiles to describe racialized attraction through language such as “Not attracted to Asians.” Among gay and bisexual men, sexual racism is a highly contentious issue. Although some characterize discrimination among partners on the basis of race as a form of racism, others present it as a matter of preference. In May 2011, 2177 gay and bisexual men in Australia participated in an online survey that assessed how acceptably they viewed online sexual racism. Although the men sampled displayed diverse attitudes, many were remarkably tolerant of sexual racism. We conducted two multiple linear regression analyses to compare factors related to men’s attitudes toward sexual racism online and their racist attitudes more broadly. Almost every identified factor associated with men’s racist attitudes was also related to their attitudes toward sexual racism. The only differences were between men who identified as Asian or Indian. Sexual racism, therefore, is closely associated with generic racist attitudes, which challenges the idea of racial attraction as solely a matter of personal preference.

Introduction

Discrimination between potential sexual or romantic partners on the basis of perceived racial identity has been referred to as “sexual racism.” Stember (1978) initially defined sexual racism as, “the sexual rejection of the racial minority, the conscious attempt on the part of the majority to prevent interracial cohabitation” (p. xi). Today, “sexual racism” is popularly employed in media and research settings as shorthand for racial discrimination between sexual or romantic partners. There is contention, however, about whether this is an appropriate label when it comes to understanding something as complex and personal as desired. Indeed, some commentators contend that distinguishing among partners on the basis of perceived race is not racism at all but a justifiable personal preference (e.g., Matheson, 2012). Researchers have sought to unpack the intersections of race and sexuality in our contemporary (and increasingly digital) world (e.g., Lin & Lundquist, 2013; Phua & Kaufman, 2003; Plummer, 2008) but very little is understood about people’s attitudes toward sexual racism or whether those attitudes differ from broader racist attitudes.

Early writing on sexual racism focused almost exclusively on heterosexual relationships between Black and White people living in the USA (Hernton, 1965; Stember, 1978) but more recent work has focused on other populations. A study of profile ads found that men looking for other men were more likely than men seeking women to assess the racial characteristics of their partners and that they were more likely to self-describe in racial terms (Phua & Kaufman, 2003). This research also found that men seeking men were more likely to assess other physical features of prospective partners, such as eye and hair color. One interpretation of these findings is that gay and bisexual men are more explicit about the characteristics they desire in a partner, but it is also important to consider how such forthrightness may deliberately or inadvertently reproduce racial discrimination in
