

Public Perceptions of Biotechnology: Another Look

A survey of New Jersey residents calls into question what the public really thinks about genetically engineered products

William K. Hallman

Despite the ongoing debate among experts over potential consumer acceptance of biotechnology, little published research has detailed how U.S. consumers actually feel about biotechnology or its products. While there has been a great deal of proprietary research into consumer acceptance of particular biotechnology products over the past decade, only two empirical studies of U.S. consumers' attitudes concerning biotechnology have been readily available to academic researchers.^{1,2}

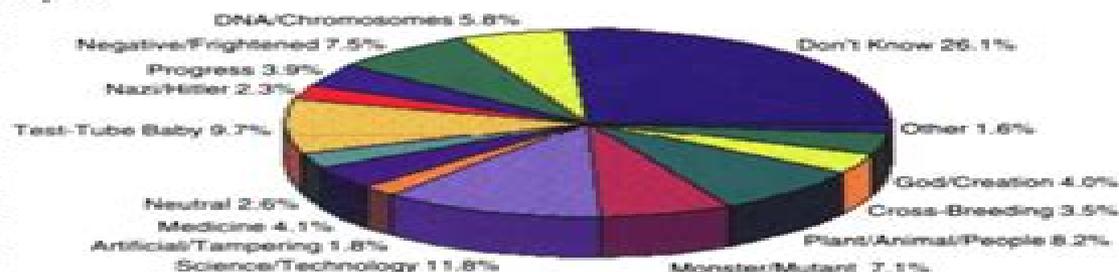

To better understand public perceptions of biotechnology, and potential acceptance of genetically engineered agricultural products, a telephone survey of New Jersey residents was commissioned by Rutgers University (New Brunswick, NJ) in May 1993.³ New Jersey is a unique test bed for this type of study: Not only is it a center for agricultural biotechnology research, but it also is home to a number of international pharmaceutical companies. This article presents a summary of selected data obtained from the survey and explores the implications for the continued development of biotechnology products. These results represent perhaps the most recent attempt to assess public perceptions of biotechnology in the U.S.

First Impressions

Overall, the survey demonstrated that most citizens seem to be in the initial stages of making up their minds about this new technology. Throughout this survey most respondents were quite introspective, carefully considering their answers, as if they were really thinking about the issues for the first time. This is supported by the fact that 80% of New Jersey's citizens believe that they have at least an adequate understanding of science and technology, yet more than half of those interviewed (52%) said that they had heard little or nothing about genetic engineering. Not surprisingly, respondents who said that they belonged to scientific, environmental, or consumer groups, and those who work as scientists or engineers were more likely to have heard or read about genetic engineering than other respondents. However, while their professions are likely to be profoundly affected by advances in biotechnology, medical professionals and food growers were no more likely to have heard of genetic engineering than other groups of respondents.

When asked to report the first thought or image they associated with the words "genetic engineering," it was again evident that many people have not given biotechnology much thought. More than one-quarter of those interviewed (26%) were unable to respond, even after additional prompting (see Figure 1). Equally significant is that nearly 20% of those interviewed had specific negative first thoughts or images about genetic engineering, responding with words like: "frightened," "escaping virus," "disease," "Nazi/Hitler," "mad scientist," and "monsters." An additional 10% referred to images of test-tube babies, embryos, cloning, and the book Born New World.

But not all of the public's first thoughts or images concerning genetic engineering were negative. Over one-third (36%) of the responses were related to science and technology or general thoughts about plants, animals, and people. Moreover, about 8% of the responses were very positive references to medical advances, progress, and safety.

Products, Not Process

Approval or opposition to biotechnology products does not seem to be based on the process of genetic engineering. Rather, it seems to be related to the type of product produced by the process. For example, a majority (61%) of New Jersey residents say that they approve of using genetic engineering

Public Perceptions of Biotechnology Waldemar Klassen,1987 Biotechnology - The Science and the Business
Derek G. Springham,Vivian Moses,Ronald E. Cape,2020-08-18 Biotechnology has not stood still since 1991 when the first edition of Biotechnology The Science and the Business was published It was the first book to treat the science and business of technology as an integrated subject and was well received by both students and business professionals All chapters in this second edition have been updated and revised and some new chapters have been introduced including one on the use of molecular genetic techniques in forensic science Experts in the field discuss a range of biotechnologies including pesticides the flavor and fragrance industry oil production fermentation and protein engineering On the business side subjects include managing financing and regulation of biotechnology Some knowledge of the science behind the technologies is assumed as well as a layperson s view of buying and selling As with the first edition it is expected that this book will be of interest to biotechnology undergraduates postgraduates and those working in the industry along with students of business economics intellectual property law and communications New Developments in Biotechnology: Public perceptions of biotechnology ,1987 Bioprocessing Safety Warren C. Hyer,1990 New Developments in Biotechnology: Public perceptions of biotechnology ,1987 Mad Cows and Mother's Milk, Second Edition William Leiss,2004-11-25 Communicating the nature and consequences of environmental and health risks is still one of the most problematic areas of public policy in Western democracies Mad Cows and Mother s Milk outlines the crucial role of risk management in dealing with public controversies and analyses risk communication practice and malpractice to provide a set of lessons for risk managers and communicators This second edition adds new case studies on mad cow disease in North America climate change and genetics technologies The first of the new case studies brings the story of the Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy BSE outbreak in the United Kingdom in the 1980s up to date Mad cow disease is still being discovered in UK herds and cases of mad cow disease have been found in twenty countries across the European continent and as far away as Japan with devastating consequences for the food industry BSE has now been discovered on the North American continent in two cows born in Canada The original cause of these two new cases is almost certainly importation of infected cattle cattle feed or both from Britain Canadian government regulators and those in the cattle industry have failed to correctly assess the risks of the disease in the Canadian herd take the precautionary measures needed to prevent the spread of disease and communicate risks and precautionary measures to the public The second new study deals with global warming Not only is every aspect of this risk debate both contentious and difficult for the public to understand but the potential consequences of the risks extend all the way to global catastrophe for human civilization A new chapter outlines the many dimensions of risk debate in the context of the need for effective and sustained dialogue by an informed public The last new case study provides an introduction to genomic science which is placed in the context of both the health benefits expected from genetic manipulation and some of the risk factors associated with it One example is gene therapy which can be used to eliminate inherited genetic diseases i e cystic fibrosis enhance human traits i e athletic performance and perhaps double life spans Gene technologies are relevant to some of the most fundamental human values This new chapter suggests that we must think about the range of new risks introduced by these technologies as well as the potential benefits and that we should do this collective thinking soon since given the furious pace of genomics discoveries the possibilities will be with us sooner than we imagine All of the case studies emphasize the need for effective communication about risks to allow effective dialogue by informed publics on health and environmental risks
