

enlightened associates of her day, watched in approach within her. She had but too long on Voltaire and Rousseau not to have the abuse of the crown. She detested the Queen's court, and at last home I found home full of compliments, madrigals and verses directed at Marie Antoinette and her favourites. It was "the quality" who copied and passed round these libels. The most biting among them were in my grandfather's hand, and perhaps she had composed them; it was in the last year or more an epigram upon some gallivanting in the court, and it was the philosophic opposition of the day which took up this characteristically French literary form. Some of these epigrams were most original and daring. They rhymed in the language of the court, and the subject of the remark was borrowed for dinner upon the paternity of the Dauphin or the dissipation of 'the German woman'; both mother and child were denigrated with the car-a'-cra-cra. Oh, don't imagine these songs issued from the People! They came from the salons, and were done over the crown.

My grandfather was forced to accept the considerable reduction which the Revolution effected in her revenues. From the remains of what she considered the remains of her marital fortune, she bought the estate of Nohant, not far from Châteauneuf, her relations and her way of life attached her to the province of Berry.

I shall now say a few words about this estate, where I was reared and spent most of my life, and where I should like to die.

The location is modest, the house simple and unpretentious. The countryside is plain though situated in the Nevers valley, a vast and admirable one. It is just the central location in the most level part of the country, in a large field of green land, then deepens as of the various prospects one may enjoy from heights or slopes. You see here a wide blue horizon, and some hills of various shape, and we live in Berry and here, the view is magnificent. It pleases us, and we love it.

My grandfather loved it very, and my father repaired here until the troubles of his life to seek hours of sweet repose. The rich groves of oaks, the great walnut trees with their full crowns, the shaded lanes, the trampled bushes, the overgrown churchyard, the little oval valley, the ancient gateway, the tall, half-mast elm, the pasture encircled by a stone retaining wall, solitary and green long patches - all give to the eye and heart in the heart what one has lived so long and thus healthily, calm, and quiet surroundings.

Portrait of her, George Sand's grandfather, and his mother, Marie de Courmont, who was the mistress of Frederick Augustus.

George Sand was born in the year of Napoleon's coronation, Year XII of the French Republic.
