

An evaluation of the hospital component of general practice vocational training

KAREN KEARLEY

SUMMARY. The contribution of the hospital component of vocational training to the needs of the future general practitioner was investigated by undertaking semi-structured interviews with a representative sample of doctors involved. The findings indicated that, in general, training was failing to address objectives perceived to be important for general practice by the study sample. Problems related to the context and style of hospital training also emerged, which appeared to be limiting the learning potential of this type of experience for general practitioner trainees. It is apparent that there is a need to clarify priority objectives for the hospital component of vocational training, and ensure that it provides the opportunity to achieve them.

Introduction

BOTH undergraduate medical education and postgraduate vocational training for general practice take place predominantly in hospital; during the nine years between entry to medical school and emergence as a principal, an average of only about 12% of time is spent in general practice. It follows that the contribution of hospital experience to the education and training of general practitioners merits scrutiny.

Historically, general practitioners had lost responsibility for teaching medical students by the end of the nineteenth century.¹ Over the past 30 years some progress has been made towards developing the potential contribution of general practice to undergraduate education,² but the 'short duration of many courses in general practice suggests it may not be realistically possible to achieve course objectives'.³ This state of affairs may even lead to vocational training for general practice providing for the 'shortcomings of undergraduate education'.⁴

At postgraduate level, mandatory vocational training continues in the same trend, providing only one year in general practice within a three year programme. The Royal Commission of Medical Education in 1968 proposed two years training in general practice, within a five year programme, but this was never implemented 'partly due to convenience and finance ... and partly because the full educational needs of general practitioners had not been fully established'.⁵ By 1977 there was 'a great dearth of evidence for or against the relative efficiency' of the three year programme of vocational training for general practice.⁶

Since that time, doubts about the hospital component of general practice training have emerged: 'we are training for too long in one context for practice in another',⁷ and being taught by those 'with no direct experience of general practice'.⁸ Some objectives of general practice training are felt to be unattainable within, even compromised by, hospital experience,⁹ the general practice year being used to counteract previous influencing factors and to introduce new perspectives.

Recently 'serious educational deficiencies'¹⁰ in the hospital component of training have been revealed and an imbalance between service commitment and education clearly demonstrated.^{10,11} In particular, little or no general practice oriented teaching in hospital was reported in both the 1981 national survey among trainees¹² and in its 1989 sequel.¹³

However, the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice recently expressed concern 'that in the future it should not become more difficult for intending general practitioners to obtain training in good quality hospital posts' and, among trainees, there is an unmet demand for posts in obstetrics and paediatrics.¹⁴ Thus, notwithstanding problems, the hospital component is perceived as having an important contribution to make to vocational training.

In these circumstances, an attempt to evaluate hospital based training for general practice in a more systematic way appeared appropriate. The present study was undertaken in one National Health Service region (Mersey) and comprised interviews with a representative sample of those involved in vocational training for general practice, both as teachers and learners. This paper describes the findings and considers the actual and potential contribution of hospital experience to general practice vocational training. The aims of the study were: (1) to define a selection of objectives for the hospital component of vocational training; (2) to evaluate the extent to which these are being achieved; and (3) to explore factors influencing trainee learning in the hospital setting.

Method

Sample

Four groups of doctors were interviewed: hospital consultants whose establishments included senior house office posts regularly used by vocational training; general practice trainees currently undertaking the hospital component; principals in general practice who had experienced vocational training for general practice within the last five years; and general practitioners who were appointed trainers for the practice component of vocational training. Given the range of hospital disciplines involved in vocational training, an early decision was made to limit the study to obstetrics and gynaecology and paediatrics, both of which form part of the hospital component for the majority of trainees. For similar logistic reasons the samples of doctors were drawn from just three districts of Mersey region: the city of Liverpool, the Wirral peninsula and Cheshire. They include a wide range of hospitals (teaching and district general) and contexts (urban, suburban and rural) within which general practice is conducted.

The sample of doctors from the four groups above was drawn from lists provided by the regional adviser in general practice, the relevant hospitals and the appropriate family practitioner committees. Of a total of 56 doctors approached only four (two consultants, one each in paediatrics and obstetrics and gynaecology, and two general practice trainers) declined to be interviewed. In a pilot study interviews were carried out with 22 doctors and for the main study a further stratified random sample of 30 doctors was used — six consultants and three trainees in each discipline, six general practitioner trainers and six general practitioner principals. Thus data from 52 doctors contributed to the findings. In the quotes given doctors in the main study are identified by numbers and those in the pilot study by letters.
