

REFORMING REGULATION: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS IN QUEENSLAND

Peter Casey *

The question that this paper seeks to address is whether or not the desired objective of regulatory reform, a key focus of the national macro economic reform agenda, can be implemented. Recent Queensland experience suggests that the probability of achieving successful regulatory reform is quite low, for a variety of reasons.<sup>1</sup>

The Queensland government has embarked on an ambitious process of reform of all policy, legislation, and regulation affecting business in Queensland. The administrative focus of this reform process is the Business Regulation Review Unit (BRRU) of the Department of Business, Industry and Regional Development (DBIRD). The unit, in conjunction with all relevant government departments, has three broad objectives:

- to systematically review business regulations and legislation;
- to investigate complaints about business regulations; and
- to promote the harmonisation of business regulations between the commonwealth and the states (Smith 1991, p.6) with an overall goal of achieving "minimum regulatory interference with maximum community protection" (DBIRD 1991a, p.2).

The program is based on the notion that departments should review their regulatory regimes as part of their normal management process. Each chief executive has submitted a detailed program for the review of all relevant legislation and other regulatory activities which impact on the business sector. Each program was developed in consultation with the BRRU and, prior to finalising a consolidated review program for cabinet's consideration, the unit consulted with the Queensland Business and Industry Council (QBIC) (an advisory body established by the Goss government in its first term, 1989-92) and industry associations to ensure that the priorities of the business sector were taken into account. The unit then undertook the preparation of a coordinated, government-wide review program for cabinet consideration (see DBIRD 1991b for details of the program).

The entire program of review is to be completed by 31 December 1994 with the unit responsible for its administration, including the provision of training staff as necessary. No additional staff or resources are allocated for the departmental review program. Each chief executive will provide a six-monthly summary of reviews completed, progress on incomplete reviews and reviews to be commenced, with the BRRU reporting on progress to cabinet at regular intervals. Individual reviews will not be accepted as complete until the BRRU certifies that an approved review process has been followed and the relevant review program is in accordance with the objectives of the program. While there is no single, prescriptive format for the provision of certification, the unit will be looking, for example, for details on:

- detailed arguments as to why the regime should not be repealed;
- details of the evaluative process;
- consultative processes undertaken;
- the implementation plan; and
- indications of savings and costs accruing to the public and private sectors as a result of the proposed changes.
