Abstract: The effects of information technology in every facet of human endeavour have become very tremendous as information technology tool keep redefining and restructuring society. It is, therefore obvious that its impact on the global economy is tremendous as it has redefined world economic concept. The impact of industrial revolution and many previous technologies cannot be compared to that of information technology revolution. The major aim of this study is not just to eulogise the great effects of information technology on world economy but to also bring to the fore the attendant divide the use and access to the tool is creating between less developed and developing communities, nations and continents. In order to achieve this objective, researchers did review the various testimonies about the impact of information technology in different human endeavours and by extension world economy. The data used are basically secondary data with which researchers surveyed, narrated, explained and drew inferences. The result shows that apart from the digital divide that exists between the technologically advanced and technological less advanced, information technology is a great enabler of development and therefore has impacted positively to world economy through increase in productivity, educational advancement and access, community development, creation of empowerment and enhanced economic growth.

Key words: Information technology, economy, productivity, knowledge economy, digital economy

INTRODUCTION

In April 2000, at a new economic summit convened by Bill Clinton, it was declared that technology is the engine behind the new economy. That is to say that information technology, the leading technology globally is the engine behind the new world economy termed digital economy. It is pertinent to note that information technology has affected the way the world is shaped economically as it affects health, information creation and dissemination, political discuss, meetings, trade, business, education, job creation, security and so on. Worthy of note is the fact that communities and by extension countries that have little or no access to modern information technology tools are basically shut out of modern political, social and economic discuss and are referred to as being developing or underdeveloped economically.

Educational institutions are not left out in the drive as schools are now adjudged by the level of their technological acquisitions, dissemination of information through the internet and use of information technology tools among their staff and students. In world ranking of universities, it is a known fact that world best institutions are ranked based on Webometrics, the availability and accessibility of the institution around the world. Distance education or open universities as the case may be in recent times are only feasible through the internet. The list is endless on the great impact of information technology tools in redefining human life in recent times around the world.

The level of job creation brought about by information technology is tremendous through technology outsourcing, software design and knowledge creation. Countries are re-strategising by including information technology education in their curriculum starting from early childhood education. In recent years, researchers have documented the influence of technology on individual workers, organisation and industries, market places and wages (Tushman and Anderson, 1986; Bartel and Sicherman, 1998, 1999). This shows that information technology has affected communities, countries and transformed economies. This study tends to re-examine and bring to the fore the positive impacts of information technology on world economy and its attendant challenges to technologically less advantaged countries by the way of digital exclusion.
