

Paternity Question

Having a blood test is not the best way of determining paternity. Though it does help rule out some things, for instance, that ABO systems is a great way to figure out whether he is the father, of this genetic code. In this case, there is still a chance that he is still the father because the ABO system does not rule out him as a father. This is because multiple with A and B blood types can still have children with either type A, B, AB, or O blood type.

Here's why:

Blood typing can help determine paternity. Suppose an unknown woman gives birth, changes a certain man's name being the father, and asks for child support. He demands blood tests, which show that the mother is type A, the baby is type A, and he is type B. Does the evidence rule him out as the father? Please explain and discuss why or why not.

1. Your original post must have a clear understanding of the topic and should be a minimum of 1 paragraph with at least 10 sentences.
2. You must respond to the posts of any 3 students. The responses should be a minimum of 1 paragraph with at least 10 sentences.
