

Within-Case and Across-Case Approaches to Qualitative Data Analysis

Lioness Ayres
Karen Kavanaugh
Kathleen A. Knafel

The generalizations developed by qualitative researchers are embedded in the contextual richness of individual experience. Qualitative data management strategies that depend solely on coding and sorting of texts into units of like meaning can strip much of this contextual richness away. To prevent this, some authors have recommended treating individual accounts as whole cases or stories, but whole cases are difficult to compare with one another when the goal of the research is to develop generalizations that represent multiple accounts. In this article, the authors describe the ways in which three different qualitative researchers combined across-case coding and sorting with a variety of within-case data management and analysis techniques to produce contextually grounded, generalizable findings.

Keywords: qualitative research methods; narrative; phenomenology; concept development

One strength of qualitative research is its ability to illuminate the particulars of human experience (see, for example, Sandelowski, 1996; Stake, 1995) in the context of a common phenomenon. Typically, qualitative researchers collect multiple accounts of common experience such as parenting a child with a disability, undergoing breast cancer treatment, or recovering after heart surgery. These multiple accounts make up the narrative data from which the researcher's generalizations about breast cancer treatment or heart surgery are drawn (see, for example, Ayres & Poirier, 1996). In addition to the general context of the phenomenon in question, which is common to all participants' accounts, each individual account of experience occurs in a context of its own. The qualitative researcher must develop an interpretation of these data that reflects each individual's experience and applies equally well across all of the accounts that constitute the data set.

In the course of their analyses, qualitative researchers must distinguish between information relevant to all participants and those aspects of the experience that are exclusive to particular informants. Such distinctions are necessary because those aspects of an experience that are unique to one individual have limited
