Pulmonary sequelae of neonatal respiratory distress in very low birthweight infants: a clinical and physiological study

Y C WONG, C S BEARDSMORE, AND M SILVERMAN

Department of Paediatrics and Neonatal Medicine, Institute of Child Health, Hammersmith Hospital, London

SUMMARY Twenty infants, mechanically ventilated in the neonatal period for respiratory distress syndrome, were compared with 15 healthy controls, matched for birthweight (less than 1501 g) but greater in mean gestational age. Clinical features and lung mechanics (by whole body plethysmography) were recorded at 6-monthly intervals until about one year. The neonatal course of the mechanically ventilated infants was commonly complicated by tracheobronchial hypersecretion and the later course by a fairly high incidence of lower respiratory tract illness. In this group, thoracic gas volume, dynamic compliance, pulmonary and airways conductance were all abnormal during the middle 4 months of the first year and reverted towards normal towards the end of the first year. The control group had normal lung mechanics. Early lung function tests were of limited value in predicting later lower respiratory tract illness, which was more common in boys, after neonatal mechanical ventilation for longer than 24 hours or raised ambient oxygen for longer than 5 days. There were few predictive physical signs. In this group of very low birthweight infants, respiratory distress syndrome of sufficient severity to require mechanical ventilation led to significant physiological and clinical disturbances of lung function which lasted into the second 6 months of life and which were particularly severe in those who had recurrent lower respiratory tract illness.

Recent advances in ventilatory support have improved survival for preterm infants suffering from respiratory distress syndrome (RDS).¹⁻⁴ However, it has become clear that some survivors may develop pulmonary sequelae. Thus bronchopulmonary dysplasia is not rare in infants of low birthweight who are treated with intermittent positive pressure ventilation (IPPV).⁵⁻¹⁰ Chest infections during the first year of life are a common sequel. Several studies of pulmonary mechanics have shown that impaired lung function is not uncommon after IPPV.^{9, 11, 12} Such effects as these might be expected to be more severe in very low birthweight infants, who form an increasing proportion of newborn infants requiring respiratory intensive care.

This report represents the results of a prospective study of a cohort of infants with birthweight <1501 g admitted to the Premature Baby Unit of Hammersmith Hospital who survived the neonatal period. Pulmonary sequelae were studied clinically, together with investigations of lung mechanics during the first year of life. The aim was to describe the sequelae and to determine possible aetiological factors.

Patients and clinical management

Patients were drawn from a cohort of 86 infants with birthweight <1501 g admitted to the Premature Baby Unit at Hammersmith Hospital between December 1978 and November 1979. Forty of the 59 surviving infants took part in the study after informed parental consent had been obtained; 19 survivors were not enrolled since it was thought that regular follow-up was unlikely.

For the analysis of lung function tests, the 40 infants followed up were divided into three groups according to diagnosis and early respiratory support. Fifteen of the infants (the control group) had no significant neonatal respiratory disease and required <48 hours of oxygen therapy, although 2 were briefly subjected to IPPV, one for no clear reason at a referring hospital¹³ and the other for 24 hours postoperatively after a laparotomy for intestinal
