CHRISTOPHER WHITE

During the past decade Old Master drawings have soared in price as both the quality and quantity of what has been available have sharply decreased. It has almost seemed as though the days were over when one could build a collection from scratch and that one could only hope to make the occasional significant or attractive addition to an existing collection. And yet, as Dr. Armand Hammer has shown, given the necessary resources and an iron determination and being the willing recipient of good advice, one need not find it as difficult as a pessimistic observer might suppose. In one year Dr. Hammer assembled drawings by Raphael, Correggio, Dürer, Rembrandt, Watteau and Giambattista Tiepolo, to mention only the highlights. judgment has finally been vindicated, for it has now generally been accepted as the work of the master, and it will be included in the Fischel corpus of Raphael's drawings. Done at the best period of his career, it gives a telling contrast between the free outline drawing of the figure of the angel and the elaborately realized figures of the prophets, executed in a combination of hatching, wash and white body-colour. The sheet also has documentary importance, for the fresco has suffered over the years and has been repainted.

The reappearance in London of a plant study in body-colour on vellum (Fig. 2) which immediately had serious claims to be considered as the work by
