

MEASUREMENT AND EVALUATION IN MUSIC EDUCATION: A POSITION PAPER

Diana Santiago¹

INTRODUCTION

Educators, administrators and parents alike agree that evaluation of instruction is an important feature of the educational process. For the educators, evaluation is a tool to help them improve instruction; for administrators, parents and taxpayers, it is the instrument for appraising the quality and worth of programs, in order to avoid waste of time and/or money. There is not a general consensus, however, on the appropriate procedures for evaluating. This is particularly true in music and in the arts in general, where the affective domain assumes an important role in the curriculum. Tests, the traditional instrument of measurement, are advocated by a large group and condemned by another large group, both of which vehemently present arguments to support their positions.

Evaluation encompasses all aspects of the educational process. It includes student evaluation, teacher evaluation, program evaluation and research evaluation. To make things even more difficult, each one of these subjects can be evaluated at different levels. For example, students can be evaluated individually or in groups, by themselves, by their peers, or by their superiors in the educational hierarchy, and so forth. Add to this picture the fact that evaluation assumes a preponderant position in the performing life of students and artists, and the amplitude of the subject is evident.

Although not claiming to be all-embracing, this paper attempts to outline the major points of the issue, showing the divergent opinions among specialists and concluding with some suggestions. These suggestions will be directed to Bahia State, Brazil, and to the international music education community.

REVIEW OF THE LITERATURE

The material for this review of the literature on measurement and evaluation was mostly compiled from major journals in music education in North America, but includes chapters from standard books on the subject, a position paper from a major educational association, an article from High Fidelity/Musical America and another one from Educational Review. Several interesting publications on particular aspects of measurement and evaluation were listed and examined, but they had to
