The Concept of Science

There is no individual that can exactly identify when and where science began.

- From the genesis of time, science coexisted with human and nature.

Literatures defined science in various ways. From the old notion that suggests science as an organized body of knowledge, wisdom, and experiences concerning the natural and physical world, this conception has evolved to include attitudes, processes, and skills through which science as a body of knowledge is formed (Pawilen 2006).

The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language (2004) defines science as:

- "The observation, identification, description, experimental investigation, and theoretical explanation of natural phenomena."

Snir, et al. (2003) characterized science as:

- "An ongoing theoretical dialogue with nature, in which scientists have developed successively more powerful models to account for a wider range of phenomena."

This shows that the focus of science is to develop reasoning skills to understand nature.

- Cobern(1993) pointed out that science, in a broader cultural sense, is also a way of understanding the world and human interactions with it.

For Waters and Diezmann (2003), science is:

- "A human endeavour within which people try to make sense of the environment and a worldview that is built around practices that purport to guide the individual towards a personal understanding."

Gribbin (2003), from a historical perspective, also defines science as:

- "An intellectual as well as a social activity carried out by humans in their pursuit to have a better understanding of the natural world."
- Cajete (1999) defines science as a cultural as well as individual process of thoughts.
- Bybee (1997), and Thier and Daviss (2002) define science in relation to scientific literacy that includes: processes, skills, concepts, and the ability to communicate ideas based on reasons.
- It is a process of finding out and a system for organizing and reporting discoveries (Lind 1997).
- Science is also construed as a form of social language developed by the scientific
