

Radical vs. incremental change

How should governments approach change? Should they scratch failed attempts off the list and go back to the drawing board? Or is better to implement gradual, incremental improvements that'll promote long-lasting change?

Radical change

Radical change calls governments to move past a current practice and create a new one entirely to better suit the obstacles presented.

Depending on the urgency of a problem, radical change can be a good tactic to promote instantaneous change.

Radical change

Incremental change attempts to solve problems with small, systematic steps that provoke change over time.

By using this approach, a government can reduce the risk and focus on trying to improve the system they already have in place, rather than starting from scratch and create a new one.

Radical and incremental change both have their value:

Incremental change is a good tactic when there are problems related to the functionality within a government. The point of incremental change is to grease the machine, making a more efficient model than what existed prior to the change.

For critical issues, such as climate change, citizens are demanding that politicians see the urgency and act in radical ways.
