

Interfacing

Interfacing between Input/Output devices and the CPU is must for a system. Because both the input and output devices have specific electrical characteristics, that are often different than the technology of the CPU. In case of switches being used as input devices, then the problem of 'bouncing' of the switch must be taken into account and must be compensated. Or to use an output device, translation is often needed to convert output signals of the CPU to a format that the output device can use. Port, which is generally accompanied with each system, is used by each input and output devices for communication with the system.
