PREFACE

This book defends a particular view of practical reasoning. Since practical reasoning is characteristic of us as living human beings acting in the world, it defends a particular view of human beings. The British moral philosopher Elizabeth Anscombe once said, rightly, that there could be no philosophy of ethics that was not founded on a proper philosophy of mind. I do not say that this book provides the foundations she was looking for, but it is an attempt to clear some of the ground involved in doing this. It is only when we have human nature under some control that human ethical nature comes under control.

The outline of the investigation is as follows. In the first chapter I set the scene, describing some of the emotional and practical features of ethical thought, and assessing from this standpoint the position of critics of ethics. Chapter 2 describes some of the ways in which we moralize: the features of situations that set us off, and the priorities philosophers have attempted to give them. The third chapter presents my expressivist or projectivist way of understanding moral thought. Here as well we explore a naturalistic account of what it is to value something, and thence what we are expressing when we voice our values. The fourth chapter turns to other theories of the moral proposition: the focus of our thoughts as we wonder what to do, or what it is right to do or best to do. I take issue with various attempts to understand this proposition.

Chapters 5 and 6 pursue the theory of motivation, first via an extended treatment of the idea that we either are, or ought to be, 'well-interested', and second via an investigation of rational agency as it is construed in decision theory and game theory. I argue against the supposed 'rational' or normative implications of these theories, seeing them instead in terms of an interpretative grid from which we read both the individual's best interests and motivation. This distinction has
