Abstract Multipurpose operation is adopted by most reservoirs in Taiwan in order to maximize the benefits of power generation, water supply, irrigation and recreational purposes. A multiobjective approach can be used to obtain trade-off curves among these multipurpose targets. The weighting method, in which different weighting factors are used for different purposes, was used in this research work. In Taiwan, most major reservoirs are operated by rule curves. Genetic algorithms with characteristics of artificial intelligence were applied to obtain the optimal rule curves of the multi-reservoir system under multipurpose operation in Chou-Shui River Basin in central Taiwan. The model results reveal that different shapes of rule curves under different weighting factors on targets can be efficiently obtained by genetic algorithms. Pareto optimal solutions for a trade-off between water supply and hydropower were obtained and analyzed.

Introduction

The study of genetic algorithms (GAs) was originated by Holland (1975). GAs have been developed to become a powerful optimization approach. In the theory of GAs, Brindle (1981) improved the roulette wheel selection; Wright (1991) and Eshelman et al. (1992) developed real-value coding to solve related problems. GAs were applied to water resources systems by Goldberg and Kuo (1987) for pipeline optimization. Wang (1991) applied GAs to the calibration of a conceptual rainfall-runoff model. McKinney and Lin (1994), Ritzel et al. (1994), and Cieniawski et al. (1995) solved ground-water problems with GAs.

So far, there have been very few applications of GAs to reservoir systems optimization. East and Hall (1994) applied GAs to a four-reservoir problem; the objective was to maximize the benefits from power generation, irrigation and water supply. Fahmy et al. (1994) also applied GAs to a reservoir system, and compared the performance of the GAs with dynamic programming. Oliveira and Loucks (1997) used GAs to evaluate operating rules for a multi-reservoir system. Chang and Chen (1998) applied a GA to solve a flood control operation problem. Sharif and Wardlaw (2000) used GAs to solve a multi-reservoir system optimization problem in Brantas Basin located in Indonesia.

This research uses GAs for obtaining optimal rule curves in a reservoir system operation and finds the Pareto optimal solutions for water supply and hydropower generation in Chou-Shui River Basin in central Taiwan.
