

RADIO DESIGN IN A GOLDEN AGE

What comes to your mind when you think of "vintage radio?" For many that phrase conjures images of large wooden radio cabinets, families gathered around listening to popular broadcasts.

But new materials and smaller components meant that radios could be manufactured smaller than those large cabinets of the very early 20th century. These new, smaller tabletop plastic radios could be sold to individuals instead of households, and created a boom in radio manufacturing in during the 1930s and '40s and on into the '50s.

Fueled by the emerging profession of industrial design, the advent of new plastic materials and more efficient manufacturing, a true golden age of radio was born.

Revolution in plastics meant that radios could be manufactured cheaper and faster than the large, usually hand-finished wooden radio cabinets. Plastic radios of this era were predominately made from three different plastics: bakelite, catalin, and polystyrene.

Bakelite radios were made from a high-pressure casting process and usually had muted color pallets and glossy sheen.

Catalin radios mimicked the look of resin, and came in a dazzling array of colors, including ones with the popular marbling effects. Styrene radios became popular in the 1950s, but were much thinner than the bakelite and catalin radios of the previous decades.

As new technologies emerged and consumer patterns changed in the years of the Great Depression, companies sought the best designers to create new products. Many great industrial designers got their start making plastic radios. Later titans of industrial design, like Harold Van Doren and Raymond Lowrey, would merge the visual style of locomotives, skyscrapers, and automobiles into the look of plastic radios, bringing an Art Deco visual language into household appliances and consumer goods.

Scores of radio manufacturers, from Arvin and Motorola to General Electric and Fado, would hire artists and illustrators to out-design each other in the mad-dash competition for sales.
