Abstract

This paper addresses the theoretical and methodological gaps in existing intellectual capital (IC) research by proposing an Intellectual Capital Integrated Measurement Model (ICIM) and a matching reporting strategy. It first reviews two dominant IC paradigms: the constitutive and the “premium perspective”. Unlike existing frameworks prioritizing internal measurement or external disclosure, ICIM integrates internal quality indicators and external market valuations, achieving dynamic, transparent value assessment. The model clarifies IC’s role as a “measurement tool + conceptual synthesis + reporting bridge”, while the reporting strategy aligns with ESG and global standards. Contributions include filling the “internal-external integration” theoretical gap, enhancing methodological feasibility, and providing actionable guidance for IC disclosure.

1. Introduction

The accelerating shift towards a knowledge-based economy has redefined corporate value creation paradigms. Traditional financial capital constraints have diminished in significance, particularly in high-tech sectors characterized by rapid product iteration. Strategic management now prioritizes intangible resources, employee creativity, organizational processes, and customer ecosystems, that collectively constitute intellectual capital (IC). While prior research has bifurcated IC into constitutive (human/structural/relational capital) and premium paradigms, this study bridges the ontological divide through an integrated measurement framework. Our contribution lies in developing a dialectical synthesis of internal quality metrics and external market valuations, addressing the methodological lacuna identified in prior work (Stable et al., 2011; Azamat et al., 2023). Broadly defined, intellectual capital encompasses all non-physical resources that can confer competitive advantages and value benefits on firms.
