 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The story One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich depicts life grievances and hardship caused by Soviet system and Bolshevism to ordinary citizens like Ivan Denisovich Shukhov. In this story, Solzhenitsyn unveils drawbacks and limitations of the Lenin's views and their consequences for an ordinary man. Repressions and spying was a result of Soviet ideology and the suppression of local initiative. Solzhenitsyn unveils that even in concentration camps the Party paid special attention to propaganda and ideology: "There were three artists in the camp. They painted pictures for the bosses, free, and also took turns painting numbers on work parade." (Solzhenitsyn).

Many of the characteristics associated with Stalinism were a logical consequence of the party's dominance. April Theses shows that the Bolsheviks spontaneously opened their ranks to politically conscious workers only during the revolutionary months of 1917. The Party very early became a mass party led by bureaucrats recruited through a deliberate policy of selecting the most talented of the workers for special training and promotion. Stalinist bureaucratic techniques proved to be adaptable for specifically internal reasons. While they did nothing to help the Bolsheviks achieve revolution, they did effectively block integration. The unschooled workers who came to leadership positions looked for guidance to the USSR.

The Russians obliged by providing advisers and policy directives which could be mechanically applied. The Lenin's Theses provided a justification for the elite's domination and conceptual tools easy to master and adequate to explain the world in
