

Bidirectional limb neural prostheses

Residual motor and sensory neurons in arms and legs of amputees can be used with implants and surgery techniques to confer different sensations and precise motor control of prostheses. Such bidirectional communication and possibly combinations of approaches should improve the quality of life for amputees.

- Residual nerve
- Muscle
- Sensors on skin
- Prosthetic device

1 Targeted muscle reinnervation

Nerves grow into new muscles, where they can excite the tissue. This is detected by sensors placed on the skin that then move the robotic prosthetic.

2 Regenerative interface

Transected peripheral nerves are sutured into a muscle graft and are implanted with myoelectric sensors that are connected to prosthesis motor controls.

3 Sensory interfacing

Sensory information, such as tactile feedback, can be restored by using various implants that stimulate electrically residual nerves.

4 Agonist-antagonist myoneural interface

Proprioceptive sensations, such as limb position and speed, are important for walking and can be restored in amputees through surgical connection of residual muscles.
