Abstract

Housing instability and intimate partner violence (IPV) compromise women's sexual and reproductive health (SRH) through reduced contraceptive access and increased risk of unintended pregnancy. This study describes the reproductive health status and needs of IPV survivors receiving housing support and explores factors influencing their experience of reproductive coercion (RC), specifically. Cross-sectional baseline data from a quasi-experimental study of 70 IPV survivors enrolled in housing programs in the Baltimore, MD, metropolitan area from June 2019 through December 2020 were analyzed. Of the 70 women enrolled in the study, 70.3 percent ($n=45$) desired to avoid pregnancy, but 57.4 percent were either using no contraceptive method (31.2%) or methods with low effectiveness (26.2%). Approximately, 1 in 6 women (16.4%, $n=11$) experienced RC in the past 3 months, which was associated with frequency and severity of IPV ($p=0.001$ to 0.005) and PTSD ($p=0.001$), as well as not sharing children with the abusive partner ($p=0.002$). This study highlights reproductive health risks in an important and under-studied population of women seeking housing due to IPV. Leaving an abusive relationship is a uniquely vulnerable time, and also a time of opportunity, as women are accessing services that can be tailored to their SRH needs. Significant results highlight vulnerability to and consequences of RC in this population. This study has implications for IPV support programs and housing programs that serve women.

Keywords Intimate partner violence · Reproductive coercion · Housing instability · Sexual & reproductive health · Contraception

Housing instability is characteristic of severe intimate partner violence (IPV) among women. IPV victims/survivors have almost four times greater odds of housing instability compared to women who have not experienced IPV, making housing instability a major concern among this vulnerable population (Pavao et al., 2007). Homeless and unstably housed women experience unique barriers to their sexual and reproductive health (SRH) including sexually transmitted infection, adverse birth outcomes and prematurity (Begun et al., 2019; Dasari et al., 2016; Ensign, 2000; Himmelstein & Desmond, 2021; Meurice et al., 2019). Little research has been done on SRH outcomes specific to homeless or unstably housed women who are also experiencing IPV, though evidence shows that risk for unintended pregnancy is elevated among homeless women due to lack of condom access, high rates of sexual victimization, transactional sex (i.e., exchange of sex for resources), as well as abusive relationships (Cronley et al., 2018; Ensign, 2000). It is clear that support for health needs is a critical component of the transition to safety and stability for women victims/survivors. Housing instability in IPV victims/survivors is associated with hospital and emergency department utilization, mental health disorders including addiction, PTSD and depression, and chronic health conditions such as diabetes, hypertension and chronic pain (Daoud et al., 2016; Rollins et al., 2012; Vijayaraghavan et al., 2012). Housing stability is a critical factor in achieving improved health outcomes for these women (Daoud et al., 2016).
