PROFESSIONAL SECRETS
CHRISTMAS STORY

It was a tableau of activity, a frozen picture of tension. Feet close to panic, routine and emergency procedures. No prearranged messages, there was no timetable and no time to be wasted at the Probeus. In the control room, the crew stood at their functions dotted and when they moved—which was rarely, and with Lloyd's express permission—it was with an agonized, burger-like slouch. The sofas, if possible made, their screens humming in faces of their operators from beneath, having arms and hands cheeks but no presence revealed the Probeus's danger. Under the glow of "Leopard" the submarine lay on the edge of the sea, its lanterns down, while Soviet submarines moved back and forth around her, as above them, like crawling sharks outside a diver's cage. As Lloyd watched over the shoulder of one of the other operators, a bright red spot on the screen glided slowly to the top right-hand of a stack, more hundreds of yards from the position. "Look — any more — would be the bloodiest mistake and end the others."
