4.2 Fluxes and magnitudes

Photometry is a technique in astronomy concerned with measuring the brightness of an astronomical object's electromagnetic radiation. This brightness of a star is given by the flux  $F$ : the photon energy which passes through a unit of area within a unit of time. The flux density,  $F_\nu$  or  $F_\lambda$ , is the flux per unit of frequency or per unit of wavelength, respectively: these are related to each other by:

$$|E_\nu d\nu| = |F_\lambda d\lambda| \quad (4.1)$$

Whilst the total light output from a star — the bolometric luminosity — is linked to the flux, measurements of a star's brightness are usually obtained within a limited frequency or wavelength range (the photometric band) and are therefore more directly linked to the flux density. Because the measured flux densities of stars are often weak, especially at infrared and radio wavelengths where the photons are not very energetic, the flux density is sometimes expressed in Jansky, where  $1 \text{ Jy} = 10^{-26} \text{ W m}^{-2} \text{ Hz}^{-1}$ .

However, it is still very common to express the brightness of a star by the ancient classification of magnitude. Around 120 BC, the Greek astronomer Hipparchos ordered stars in six classes, depending on the moment at which these stars became first visible during evening twilight: the brightest stars were of the first class, and the faintest stars were of the sixth class. It was not before 1856 that Norman Pogson calibrated the magnitude classification in terms of flux (density). He realised that the magnitude scale reflects the logarithmic response of the receptors in the retina of the human eye (which is why the human eye can see at such a vast dynamical range), and that a difference of five of the
