

The Oregon Electric Waconda substation and office north of Salem, has thus far withstood more than 75 years of neglect. It served the dual purpose of housing both the transformers and the station itself. COURTESY BOBERT M. OWENS.

The Oregon Electric Cartney Station, north of Harrisburg, is a typical example, providing living quarters for the station agent and his family as well as an office. The only change in this station, moved a quarter mile east of the railway, has been a carport addition. COURTESY BOBERT M. OWENS.

on the Olding Farm. Large tents were used as barns to house the horses and store feed as well as house the workers.

The Oregon Electric Railway contracted with Portland General Electric to supply electricity from its generating plant at the falls of the Willamette River but, in order to maintain the electricity to operate the trains, a total of eight substations were required for the 142.8 miles of track.

The electricity came into the substation as 60,000 volts of alternating current and through transformers was sent out on the line to operate the train as 1200 volts of direct current. These substations were built of poured concrete with reinforcing rod.

At least four substations are still standing. Two are totally neglected and have still weathered the ravages for 75 plus years. Several, such as the one at Waconda north of Salem, served the dual purpose of housing both the transformers and the station itself.

The 50.7 miles of track from Portland to Salem were completed in December 1907 and is thought to be the first electrified main line in the United States. Passenger service began January 1, 1908, with two trains daily each way. The passenger line ran down High Street and had a station at the southwest corner of High and State Streets in the Oregon Building.

Service to Albany began July 4, 1912. This passenger line ran down Fifth Street and the station still stands at the corner of Fifth and Lyon Streets, used today as the Veterans of Foreign Wars Building. The cost of this station in 1912 was $32,000.

Eugene received service October 15, 1912. The Eugene station, on the eastern edge of the downtown area, is presently used as the Oregon Electric Station restaurant. However, it is actually the second building, built in early 1920 to replace a smaller original structure.

Stations representative of those used on the railway remain at Donald, Cartney, Junction City, and Meadow View.

There were also two spurlines to serve communities not located on the main line. A spur ran from West Woodburn to Woodburn, but there was never a station in Woodburn; tickets were sold in a local drugstore.

The other spur ran six miles west from Gray, south of Albany, to the east bank of the Willamette River at Corvallis. There was a station at this terminus where the passengers debarked the train and crossed the Willamette River, first by ferry, and later by bridge. After the line was abandoned, the station was used by Oregon State University to house the rowing crew.

All told, there were 54 stations between Garden Home Junction and Eugene, a distance of 135.8 miles, making the average distance between stations approximately 2.5 miles.

Oregon Electric passengers enjoyed comfortable surroundings including deluxe rattan seats, shade awnings, opulent mahogany, oak and brass fittings, and overnight accommodations with 8:00 am wake-up calls.
