SUMMARY

To estimate bird survival rates, the shortcomings of methods based on recoveries (of dead birds) make it logical to use recapture information (of live birds) in specific statistical models. In this paper, the basic model of Cormack (1964) and some recent developments allowing equality constraints between parameters are reviewed. Applications to Fulmar, Starling, and Coot data are presented, with the emphasis on model selection. For Swallow data, these models designed to estimate survival are compared to more general recapture models. In conclusion, using the Cormack model and its generalisations in the course of population studies on a local scale is recommended.

1. INTRODUCTION

In the management of animal populations and in fundamental research in population dynamics, the emphasis is now on mechanisms - and as a consequence on parameters - of population changes, rather than on changes in numbers by themselves. Survival rates are as such major components of animal population dynamics. To estimate survival rates in birds, ringing provides numerous data that are a real
