Chemically Induced Cell Proliferation Byron E. Butterworth,1991 Written by leaders in their respective fields it provides current information on various roles that chemically induced cell proliferation might play in the carcinogenic process With today s intense economic competition limited environmental resources and conflicting advice to the public on personal dangers cancer policy needs to be based on the best available information The association of chemically induced cell proliferation with carcinogenic activity is so prevalent that it must be considered in evaluating the carcinogenic danger of chemicals to which people may be exposed The overviews offer insights into these mechanisms that should yield new predictive assays improved design and interpretation for cancer bioassays and more realistic risk evaluations
